[NRG ENERGY, INC. LETTERHEAD]

Date: February 16, 2009

To: All Staff

From: David Crane—President and CEO

Subject: Exelon Update and Q&A

In our ongoing effort to keep everyone informed, please see below the latest Q&A to answer some of the questions you have had since our last Q&A.

1. Exelon proposed to expand the Board and nominated a slate of directors. Why would they do that and what does it mean for our Board?

As they said they would, Exelon submitted a proposal to expand the size of the NRG Board of Directors to 19 directors (currently the Board consists of 12 directors). Exelon also proposed a slate of nine director nominees for election at our 2009 annual meeting of stockholders. According to Exelon's proposal, if elected, five of the director nominees would be to fill five of the new slots that would be created if Exelon's proposal to expand the Board is approved by our stockholders. Exelon's other four director nominees will seek to unseat the four current NRG directors who are up for re-election this year.

Exelon said that if NRG's stockholders approve the proposal to increase the size of the Board, "the two remaining seats on the expanded board would remain open to NRG's own director nominees....that its decision to leave two seats open was designed to avoid a change in control of NRG that could trigger a requirement for NRG to pay a significant amount of its debt." If Exelon's proposal to expand the size of the NRG Board of Directors is approved by NRG stockholders, and all of Exelon's nominees were elected to the Board with two additional NRG nominees, Exelon's nominees would constitute nearly 50% of the Board. If NRG declined to nominate the two extra nominees and Exelon won all nine, they would have nine board members to our remaining eight, which may trigger the change of control provisions in our senior debt facilities, with significant complications for all concerned. For more information on our viewpoint, you may read our full news release.

2. I keep reading articles reporting Exelon saying that NRG will not allow them to conduct due diligence but I thought we had addressed that issue?

As we shared with you, on January 19, we met with Exelon to discuss its unsolicited bid for NRG. During that meeting, we indicated that the price Exelon has offered has not changed and is too low, and that the risks and issues with the proposed transaction remained substantial. Exelon expressed an interest in conducting “due diligence,” a process in which Exelon would review NRG’s business operations, finances, personnel and other facets of the Company. We said that Exelon might be allowed to conduct due diligence, at a point in the future, as part of a larger process.

At this point, allowing Exelon to conduct due diligence is premature, given that it has not increased its offering price and, as Exelon’s chairman stated directly, due diligence would NOT result in an increase in their purchase price by a meaningful amount.

3. Can you illustrate the due diligence issue in an everyday perspective?

Think of it this way. You live in a home that you know is worth $300,000. The housing market is terrible but you are not concerned because you have a good job, you can service the mortgage and you can wait it out. Suddenly, someone knocks on your door, tells you that he will pay you $200,000 for your house, but can he please take a look around. Surprised, you ask him if he even has the money. No, he says, he doesn’t have the money but he’s confident that he can get it. You tell him that the offer needs to be higher, substantially higher, and he needs to have the money.

A couple of months later, he is back knocking on your door. He still doesn’t have the money—all he had done in the interim was go to the Town Hall to file to get the title to your house changed into his name. He is still offering $200,000; telling you how lucky you are to have this opportunity. And now he insists that he be allowed in for a home inspection. Do you let him in?

4. What happens if more than 50% of NRG’s shares are tendered into Exelon’s exchange offer that has been extended to February 25?

There has been a lot of incorrect information that implies that a tender of 50% or higher means that a transaction will take place. If Exelon announces that more than 50% of NRG’s shares have been tendered, it still does not mean that a transaction will take place or that Exelon has succeeded in completing its exchange offer.

As we have said in the past, the results of this exchange offer can be seen as similar to those of a political poll, and are not a binding commitment from stockholders at this point. Exelon’s principal effort is to get a sense of whether it will prevail in the proxy contest that will culminate at this year’s annual meeting, so in that sense the vote result is important but not decisive in any respect. Exelon’s announcement of a slate of alternative directors is the first step in that process and the proxy contest will take months to play out.

5. What would it take to elect Exelon’s nominees to the Board of Directors?

First, in order to increase the size of the Board to 19, Exelon would have to obtain votes for this proposal from more than 50% of NRG's stockholders. If that happens, then for Exelon's five nominees to be elected to fill the slots, those nominees would have to receive more votes from NRG's stockholders than any other nominees running for those slots, including any nominees put forth by NRG. In order for Exelon's four nominees who are challenging NRG's current directors to be elected, Exelon's nominees would need to receive more votes from NRG's stockholders than NRG's current directors receive from our stockholders.

6. If Exelon's proposed slate of directors is NOT elected at NRG's Annual Meeting, will that end Exelon's hostile attempt to take over NRG?

It would be the end of Exelon's attempt to elect directors to the NRG Board until next year's annual meeting. It is hard to say with any certainty what effect Exelon's defeat in the director elections would have on its pending exchange offer, which Exelon could continue to pursue despite such defeat. You should not assume that the proxy contest ends up with an all-or-nothing result. Many situations in the past have ended with the raider (Exelon) getting some but not all of its slate elected, as institutional shareholders often seek to ensure that the raider's views are represented on the Board, but are, at the same time, loathe to "hand the keys" to the Company to the raider.

7. I understand that as a stockholder I will continue to receive mailings. What can I expect to receive in the mail next?

As an NRG stockholder, you can expect to receive a lot of mail from both companies as long as Exelon continues to pursue its exchange offer and proxy contest. We'll provide details on those mailings in a future Q&A.

As you know, the NRG Board has recommended that stockholders not tender their shares into Exelon's offer, and we continue to ask that, if you support that recommendation, please disregard Exelon's materials. If you have already tendered your shares, you have the ability to withdraw them from the offer if you so choose.

8. In a January 20 letter to employees, you indicated that NRG is "engaging in market discovery." What does that mean? Are other companies interested in us?

"Market discovery" is a process to determine if there is a better value proposition or external alternative available to NRG. Such an opportunity could come from another company, and there are other companies interested in NRG. We believe that any transaction involving NRG must represent a fair value for our assets, operations and strategic plan, including our strong market position and future growth prospects. We also continue to pursue aggressively all aspects of our stand alone growth strategy.

9. If I sell my Restricted Stock Units (RSUs) that will be vesting in February, does that help Exelon?

If you sell your shares, it is possible the person who buys those shares may tender them to Exelon, which would help Exelon. However, the decision to keep or sell your NRG shares is a personal one that is likely to be based on many factors, including your personal financial plans.

10. At this point, are we able to determine how a potential acquisition of NRG by Exelon would affect NRG employees?

Let's stick to what we know. Exelon has already said that for its offer to be approved by regulators, it would need to sell some assets in the PJM East market, specifically our Indian River, Vienna and Dover plants. If these assets are sold, employees at these facilities would have an employer other than Exelon. If Exelon plans to retain our remaining assets, it would still need people to continue operating plants in a safe and effective manner. Their generation business is primarily nuclear. With respect to corporate and regional personnel, they would likely review our offices to determine how they would best align with Exelon's existing organizational structure. And, as you can imagine, in regions where Exelon has limited to no facilities, they may need more of our people than in regions where they have major offices.

11. On the earnings call, you said that it is time for investors to send Exelon a message. What did you mean by that?

The great majority of NRG shareholders—both those who did tender in January and those who did not—have told us the current exchange ratio offered by Exelon is grossly unfair to NRG shareholders. It captures a severely disproportionate share of NRG's value—and of the potential value embedded within the combination of the two companies—for Exelon's shareholders.

We understand many shareholders tendered to Exelon on January 6 because they saw it as a risk free way to keep the process going. But endorsing Exelon's current offer at this point may be construed as an affirmation that it implies a fair value for our Company's equity, and that simply is not so. Our shareholders can send Exelon a message by NOT tendering.

If you have further questions, please ask your manager or send them to NRGCommunications. We will use them in upcoming communications as much as possible. And be sure to visit the Exelon Information Center via the link on the Insider front page for the latest information.
